Feminine hygiene products exempt from sales tax starting October 1

Under new law, exemption applies to tampons, sanitary napkins, and related items

PROVIDENCE, R.I. – The Rhode Island Division of Taxation reminds tax professionals, taxpayers, tax software providers, businesses, and others that Rhode Island will exempt feminine hygiene products from sales and use tax starting October 1, 2019.

A recently enacted Rhode Island law exempts -- from Rhode Island’s 7% sales and use tax -- the sale, storage, use, or other consumption of feminine hygiene products effective October 1, 2019.

According to the new law, the “feminine hygiene products” category includes tampons, panty liners, menstrual cups, sanitary napkins, and “other similar products the principal use of which is feminine hygiene in connection with the menstrual cycle”.

The exemption was included in legislation approved by the Rhode Island General Assembly and signed into law by Rhode Island Governor Gina M. Raimondo on July 5, 2019.¹
